"Seven is the number of perfection." [Eden Gray] The knave stealing away with the spoils of the camp. Truth has been pilfered, and VII is a sophist suspect. The perfection of swords lies in their ability to evade detection while simultaneously walking away with the means of war. The edges of the suit hide camoullage and malintent. The knight, the king, the queen, and her lover.

Power and strength are not the same, and money plays a part. One must be strong to reject the lure of money, to take the easy way out when the challenge comes around. One must also be strong to aaccept and wield the organon of money. Strength cuts both ways, simultaneously opening and closing the mouth of the lion.

The function of king is the concrete iteration of that strength. Strength is more than power, insofar as it is solar in its manifestation, while power always works elliptically, by way of others. Strength is superordinate to power, and a lack of the former is precisely when power starts to be corrosive. Strength is the well which comprehends power.

Reversed Tarot cards.

You either love them or hate them.

Me - I love them.

Why? Because I've discovered a number of different ways to read reversed Tarot cards without getting strick in the 'doom and gloom' that is so often associated with revers But there's one technique for reading reversals that I love the most. It's soulful, healing and deeply insightful. Yet many Tarot readers aren't even aware that this technique exists!

When I look at an upright Tarot card, I see it as 'externally expressed energy'. That is, the energy of that Tarot card is [...]expressed outwardly into the world.

Upright Tarot cards represent energy that is experienced in your external environment and in your relationships with people and situations.

If upright cards represent externally expressed energy, then reversed Tarot cards are internally expressed energy. That is, energy that is held within ourselves or that is more private or even secretive.
